Hebrew-immersion charter rejected

Tate rules academy isn’t ready to open in fall

LESLEY BRODY

The state Department of Education said Monday that Shalome Academy, a Hebrew- immersion charter school, has failed to meet financial and operational standards needed to open for the fall.

The school, which opened as a non-profit organization in 1997, applied for a charter last December. State officials said the school failed to meet the requirements for the fall.

The school was founded in 1997 by a group of parents who wanted their children to be educated in a Hebrew-immersion setting. The school received a charter from the state in 2000 and has been operating as a non-profit organization since then.

However, the state officials said the school failed to meet the financial and operational standards needed to open for the fall.

The school has been operating in a temporary facility and has been seeking additional funding to help cover its costs.
